A QUARREL WITH THE VILLAIN.

A Spat With the Leading Woman-Deluging the Ingenue With Sorrow and Bair Dre

In my peregrinations about New York the other day I chanced upon a well known leading man idling away an hour with a cigar in an uptown dramatic agency. As I shook hands with him I noticed some-thing listless in his manner, a faint, sad fatigue in his eyes.

But on inquiring I found the soft, die away expression was due to reflection on the vicissitudes he had passed through during a recent tour.

Suddenly her attention was attracted by the sharp cry of a child in distress, and she saw the head and shoulders of a little girl just as they were disappearing through an air hole some distance from the singer and hidden from every other skater on the ice

SHE SWEPT THE TOUPER CLEAN OFF. "The dramatic profession is all very well as seen on the stage when the curtain is up, but when the old man, presuming on his 'past' has a tendency to making rhymes in the wings at your expense, and the villain cats peppermint just before he comes on to thrust his face close to yours, it's quite another thing.
"I had some words with the villain one night between the acts. It must have been in the early morning hours, but still dark, when I was awakened by a hard breathing at my door.

"It was the villain. He was drunk, and had come to renew the quarrel. I got up, lit the gas and swept him under the bed, where he snored until morning. "This tiff with the villain over, I had a disagreement with the leading lady. The leading lady had small feet, and clad in pretty satin slippers, too, but I wouldn't let her stand on my neck for all that; so we quar-reled, and I had the best of the argument, but her revenge was humiliating, com-plete. I—that is—unfortunately my bair was—is—just a little scant in front there, and I had a small toupee made.

"In one of the scenes I was required to embrace the leading lady effusively, and I did it, although she furtively glared at me. Then while I held her in my arms she had to pass her hand ever my brow and say something sweet. something sweet.
"She swept her white hand over my head, sure enough, but so firmly, so spite-fully, that she swept the toupes clean off. Oh, the laughter, the catcalls!—I hear them yet. In mercy to my defenseless head the curtain was rung down.

"On the train one day the ingenue, a pretty blonds, confided to me that she would 'just love to have copper colored hair.' I asked her why she did not dye it if she wanted to. With a sudden, pitcous uplifting of her eyes she said she had no one to help her. A great, resistless sym-pathy surged into my glance as it rested on the little roll of yellow hair below her hat. Alone in the world, and longing for copper The next day after luncheon I went to her room, where a fire burned brightly. She wanted hot water, hot-hot-hot, and oceans of it. We obtained two pints from bell boys at short intervals, then were ed to ask for more

"Oh, I have it? exclaimed the ingenue.
"You go out and buy a saucepan, and then we can boil all the water we like—don't physician.

"After battling with the wind in the cause of beauty for a good half hour I found a shop where saucepans were sold. Once more we set to work. I stirred her head over a basin while I poured it on. At last it was on thick. Her head looked like a painting of the world after the deluge had retired and left nothing but mud and sunset. This was left on for several hours. Even the Sunday papers palled.

"Then came the rinsing—oh, the rinsing! The tap was close by, and I wore a hole in the carpet in my toddling back and forth. out of the roots, and the young woman be
